VEGAN OPTIONS CONTINUE TO GROW IN LANSING

By DENNIS BURCK

Vegan options are no longer footnotes at the end of a menu. Within the last year, Lansing's food trucks and restaurants have taken up the challenge to create truly delicious vegan offerings certain to tempt meat eaters.

The People's Kitchen leads with some of the zaniest fare from vegan poutine to chicken and waffles. The eastside outlet has even made vegan sloppy joes. Executive chef Lissa Blon-Jacot said she enjoys cooking vegan because it is a challenge.

"I see it as pushing the boundaries of food and making it exciting for everyone," Blon-Jacot said. "I want to make it where a vegan person can sit next to meat eaters and see enough options to eat vegan as well."

On rotation at the People's Kitchen is a variant of Lansing's classic olive burger, opening up the hometown classic to those in the community who never had the chance to enjoy it.

"We have a vegan olive burger on the menu. It's a portabella-based burger with vegan olive sauce. I thought that was very locally important because I know a lot of vegans and vegetarians who have never eaten an olive burger before."

Blon-Jacot first started making vegan dishes before her time at the People's Kitchen as a healthier option for her husband with diabetes.

"It was one of the most progressive diets we tried that dropped his blood sugar the lowest," she said.

Her favorite vegan creation was from when The People's Kitchen operated in the Streetkitchen Food Truck.

"It was the vegan green bean casserole poutine. It was a plain green bean casserole on top of sweet potato fries with cranberry sauce and fried onions. Yum."

As a lifelong Lansing native, Blon-Jacot said seeing more options in Lansing is a relief because it takes dedication to cook vegan all the time.

"Now it is expanding into family-centered restaurants. This is not something that is going away so we have to do something."

While plant-based concoctions are making their way into brick and mortars, vegan options are alive and well in Lansing's streets.

Bango's food truck disguises veggie in the shape of hearty breakfast sandwiches. Co-owner Aaron Hebert stocks vegan substitutes for sausage, cream cheese and butter to customize his sandwiches.

Hebert earned his chops at Portland, Maine's Ono Cafe, a breakfast sandwich restaurant that saw him make nearly 20,000 sandwiches in his five years of service.

He said stocking vegan is important to be competitive in the market.

"When we came to Lansing, we saw people going to work in need of a real breakfast sandwich — instead of what you get at a chain coffee shop."

Opened in November 2019, Veg-N food truck is a vegan-only food truck operating across various locations. Co-owner Christabelle Dozeman said she didn't see enough vegan options in Lansing and took a crack at opening up a food truck herself.

The Michigan State University horticulture student sees the link between veganism and community sustainability.

Dozeman said having another plant-based food truck in Lansing only provides more of a network of convenience for locals seeking healthier alternatives.

“A lot of restaurants would have only one or two options and I would get sick being stuck with the same option every time,” she said. “With more options, people will realize it is an easy choice to make since we are all trying to be on the go.”

Plant-based meat options include soy sausage, veggie patties, veggie chicken patties and black bean patties. Most dishes are sandwich-based and around $10.

Dozeman recommended the reuben soysauge, a sausage take on a reuben sandwich with sauerkraut, thousand island dressing and sausage on a vegan artisan bun.

Dozeman became vegan after experimenting with non-meat-based meals, she said. “Plant-based protein is a huge thing that people should become more aware of now. Realizing that not every meal needs to be centered around meat would be huge for sustainability and health reasons.”

“Why not take the opportunity to take something and bring more healthy food into the community by making affordable healthy options that are accessible to everyone? If I can be a part of that, that’s where I want to be.”
